Dissertation: Discrimination and Well-Being Across Generations: A Longitudinal Study of Immigrant Women and Multicultural Adolescents in South Korea; directed by Jinho Kim

Abstract: This dissertation examines how nativity-based and foreign-origin discrimination shapes the psychological well-being of immigrant women and their children across two generations. Using nationally representative panel data and asymmetric fixed effects models, it identifies heterogeneous effects by country of origin, educational attainment, and family context, and draws implications for multicultural integration policies in South Korea.

2025–2026 Postdoctoral Researcher, Department of Public Administration, Ewha Womans University

Research Interests

Keywords: Social determinants of health | Immigration & acculturation | Longitudinal & panel data methods

I study the social and psychological determinants of well-being among immigrants and youth across generations in South Korea, with particular attention to discrimination, precarious employment, and family dynamics. My work applies longitudinal and panel data methods grounded in econometric approaches to produce empirical evidence for policies addressing structural inequalities.
